Read the text and answer the questions choosing the right answer.

Line number

1. Why do many global brands invest so much time in choosing particular colors for their logos
2. and packaging? The answer lies in the growing field of color psychology, which explores the
3. relationship between color and human perception. Although people rarely pay conscious attention
4. to it, color can subtly influence emotions, judgments, and even decision-making. As a result,
5. knowledge about the effects of color has become valuable not only in marketing but also in
6. education, healthcare, and workplace design.

7. Researchers argue that our responses to colors arise from a combination of biological
8. tendencies and cultural influences. Green, for instance, is widely associated with nature because
9. it dominates many natural landscapes. This connection leads people to link it with balance,
10. renewal, and well-being. Blue is often connected with clear skies and calm water, helping explain
11. why it is commonly viewed as a peaceful and dependable color.

12. Nevertheless, the symbolic meanings of colors are far from universal. Cultural traditions
13. strongly influence the way colors are interpreted. While white is linked with innocence and
14. celebration in some societies, it traditionally represents grief and mourning in others. Likewise,
15. red may symbolize luck and prosperity in certain cultures but danger or warning in others.

16. Businesses frequently rely on these associations when developing products or advertising
17. campaigns. Companies wishing to project reliability often choose blue, whereas those aiming to 18. create a sense of urgency or excitement tend to prefer red. Retail stores also make strategic use of
19. color: vivid displays are designed to capture attention immediately, while more neutral shades can
20. encourage shoppers to remain in the store for longer periods.

21. The impact of color extends beyond the commercial world. Studies suggest that certain shades
22. may affect concentration, creativity, and even physical performance. Blue environments are
23. sometimes believed to support analytical thinking, while yellow may stimulate imaginative
24. activity. Likewise, athletes wearing red uniforms are often perceived as more confident and
25. competitive, although researchers emphasize that any advantage is likely to be psychological
26. rather than physical.

27. Despite decades of investigation, the precise relationship between color and human behavior
28. remains difficult to explain. Individual experiences, personality traits, and cultural background all
29. shape the way colors are interpreted. Consequently, scientists advise against making broad
30. generalizations, even while acknowledging that color quietly influences many aspects of everyday
31. life.
